Carpenters and Painters Win Game From Mill Men

It was a glorious evening for the carpenters and painters. To, Clark Derby's splendid pitching, to Ed. Montgomery's two bagger, and last but not least to Frank Dayner's expert knowledge of baseball is owing to the fact that the Painters and Carpenters defeated the mill men of the Motz Lumber Co. last evening at the local ball yard.

Revenge was too keenly felt and too eagerly wanted, for the mill men only a week ago to the very evening defeated the carpenters and painters in a 13 inning struggle.

Derby proved himself to be master of the diamond at all times and his work was superb, having struck out nine of the men who opposed him. The hitting was splendid. There was nothing of the sloth and sleepiness which characterized their work during the game last Friday. Instead there was a lot of keen, alert athletes, every man who assisted in the pastime striving with might and main to accomplish his end; and there were none who failed, every man contributing his bit.

The last ball trick was pulled off during the fourth inning, the only time throughout the game that the mothe aten subterfuge had been attempted, Homer Frazier being the victim and Fred Steckman the perpetrator. Frazier having made a one bagger hit succeeded in arriving safe at first, but as he regained himself in the slide and struggle and stepping off the bag and advancing towards second, only to be touched by Steckman who had the ball.

The lineup and score by innings:

Coffman Here Today

W. S. Coffman of Derry township, candidate for the Republican nomination for Sheriff, was in Monessen today scouring the town for voters. Mr. Coffman met many of them and made a good impression everywhere. He is a campaigner og exceptional ability and is making many friends. He seems greatly encouraged with the prospects for winning the nomination.

—A jolly crowd of girls left Thursday to camp for two weeks at a point below Monongahela. Those in the party were Martha Mitchell, Ruth Lloyd, Anna McLain, Helen and Della Jeffries Gertrude and Frieda Gilchrist, Mary Sheridan, Marion Lewis, Lou Boore and Mrs. Andrew White.

No Money Available

Only three memebrs of the Mothers Pension board of Westmoreland county were present for the regular monthly meeting of the board, held in the Mothers' Pension office in the court house, Thursday. Mrs. U. J. Sheetz of Jeannette, presided. Because of the lack of a quorum, no business was transacted. The next meeting will be held in September. Through some hitch, funds for this county's mothers' pension fund are held up and no new pensions may be granted, although a large list of women in pitiful need are waiting for pensions. No state supervisor has yet been appointed for Mothers' Pension work in the various counties.

The Knights of Malta of the Monongahela valley will hold their annual outing at Oakland park, the new picnic grounds of the Charleroi and Bentleyville street car line. Commanderies of the valley will gather there on September 6th for a day of sport, amusement and patriotism and invite all their friends to join them.

Monessen, Charleroi, Monongahela Fayette City, Bentleyville and Coal Center have committees at work arranging for the affair which promises to be the largest of its kind ever held by this lodge. J. D. Nicolay is in charge of the local arrangements.

Rev. H. O. MacDonald of the First Presbyterian church, will be present on that occasion and deliver his famous Malta lecture, one that is pronounced a masterpiece. In the afternoon there will be a program of sports, including a ball game between members of the commanderies. Further announcement of the affair will be made in the near future.

Community Day

October 3 is a new day designated for the American people by the National Community Betterment association as "Community Day." The observance is to be throughout the nation. People are expected to consider things of patriotism nearest to them, their homes, business, churches, schools and societies on Community Day. October 3 falls on Sunday. In deciding on a date which fell on Sunday, the backers of the new Community Day believed that getting together on Sunday could be accomplished with the greatest inconvenience to the most people. Each family is asked to display the national colors on that day.

The diplomas were presented by H P. Crowell, president of the Institute

Celebrate Anniversaries

While covering police court news the other day the reporter "slipped up" on a social item that took place in the police station. It was the double anniversary celebration of the marriage of Chief of Police Wheatley and Patrolman Andy Jenkins. The affair took place Monday, the Chief having been married just twenty five years ago, while Jenkins was celebrating his twentieth anniversary.

The anniversaries almost passed unnoticed until Andy came in with a quart of cream and the two officers of the law sat down and enjoyed the refreshing delicacy while they talked over the happy events of years past.

Slowly Recovering

The many friends of M. Meyers, the clothier, will be pleased to learn that he is slowly recovering from a serious illness of the past two weeks and that in all probability. he will soon be able to be about. He has been confined to his home on Donner avenue under the care of a trained nurse and while his recovery was considered doubtful for several days, he is said to be getting along nicely. Several members of the family have been with him almost continuously and today another son, Leon Meyers arrived from Philadelphia and will remain over Sunday, hoping to see a still greater improvement before returning to his home.

Servians To Appeal For Aid

"Worse than Belgium" is now the accepted verdict regarding the conditions in Servia. The Rockefeller Foundation War Relief commission made public a report through the Associated Press on April 26th, in which it was tated that on March 10 from 25,000 to 30,000 persons wer suffering from typhus in the Servian capital, and this and other epidemics were swiftly enveloping the entire nation. Cholera was at that time expected with the arrival of the warm weather and no preparations had been made to combat it. Probably 300,000 persons were destitute and the impoverished little nation is powerless to control the situation, which the commission described as "not only a menace to the health of the Servian people, but of the whole world."

In view of these facts a committee has been formed for the purpose of helping materially people in Servia. An effort will be made to get the pastors of all denominations to co-operate in this great humanitarian work, by raising a special collection for the plague ridden Servians. An appeal to all generous Americans is made, to contribute and help a little nation in its heroic struggle for independence.

Contributions maye be sent to Rev. Vladmir M. Levkanich, chairman of committee, pastor Russian Orthodox church, Monessen, Pa.

Shuster Unopposed

A. N. Shuster who aspires to succeed himself as Justice of the Peace, has been one of the town's most capable men in public office and it is a deserving compliment that he is unopposed for the Republican nomination. Mr. Shuster is one of the town's most aggressive citizens, always to the front with his personal support in matters of public welfare and as an official he has been fair and impartial and has made his decisions and rendered justice in accordance with the evidence and his court has been well sustained by the higher courts. Mr. Shuster solicits the support of the people of Monessen for re-election, promising the same faithful performance of the duties of the office in the future as in the past.

Good Men Should Seek Nomination For Council

The most important offices at stake in the November election are those for council. Good men in council are absolutely necessary if the town is to prosper. While the office pays no salary and there are no perquisites, there was a time in the history of the borough that candidates for council were as thick as flies. And that was at a time when the town was a great deal smaller than it is at present. Monessen today has no town in the county that is superior, and for that reason it should be the ambition of its citizens, or a part of them at least, to be represented in its councilmanic chamber.

Running a borough is nothing more or less than a business proposition and big business at that. Monessen today is spending thousands upon thousands of dollars and the question in the minds of the tax payers and the voters should be— is this money being spent judiciously; the improvements that are being made going to be permanent. Are they the ones that should be made and are there not others that should receive the attention of council at the present time?

Attending council meeting is not the only function of a councilman. He should, providing he has the best interests of the town at heart, devote a considerable part of his time, in looking over the work that is being carried on by the borough. The people elected him to look after their interests, their money, their taxes and there is no way in which he can do that unless she dabbles into the different departments. A good councilman is one that is conversant with every phase of the borough government. He can tell you off hand how many men are employed in the water or street department. He knows whether the cost of the department is consistent with the good that is being done for he taxpayers. He knows whether the police are capable and whether the engineering department is doing its work as it should be done.

Monessen has some good men in council at the present and the people have it within their power to place the very best at the head of the government. While it should be the aim of a borough solon to advance the interests of his town in a pecuniary way, there are other questions that should be looked into carefully and among them is that of morality. A big town without morals isn't the kind of a town that the majority of the people want and the sooner the law makers arrive at that conclusion, the better it will be for those who expect to succeed themselves.

Voters Watch the Political Horizon

Won't it be nice though when we get all of the officials under the guilded dome in control of one boss? It will be a fine system when going to Greensburg on business of a political nature, it will not be necessary to go into the court house at all. It will be so much better to step into an office where is seated a big boss who owns the Republican party in Westmoreland county and who gives the bidding for all of the county officials. We have had this in a measure in days gone by and it seems we are drifting back to the good old days. All of the candidates would be slated as in former days, and the fellows who wanted to run without the endorsement of the combine could run, but would spend money foolishly for they couldn't get on the ticket until permission was given them, and if they persisted too much they would be spanked with the big political club.

County officials in the past few years have been pretty free from domination. They have been straying from the fold, for they seemed to realize that they owed their official life to a free ballot and they have been doing pretty much as their own conscience dictated. But this must be stopped, it seems. The men who will not play in the hands of the powers who claim to be in control are being abused, maltreated and high handed methods in doling out patronage already have been used. The free press however, is the people's safeguard and should the bomb come, it will come hard and the news will travel into the gang's headquarters faster than a forest fire, and there will be gnashing of teeth. We believe in cleaning house within the party, and now is a pretty good time to give fair warning before the disease gets too strong a hold. This is not a Democrat paper, nor a bull moose or disgruntled organ, but a straight Republican paper that has supported every nominee of its party, but we refuse to assist in building up a political machine in Westmoreland county to further certain big interests that at present aspire to leadership.

The Broken Coin

By EMERSON HOUGH

From the Scenario by Grace Cunard

A Story of Mystery and Adventure

(Copyright, 1915, by Wright A. Patterson)

"Why? What is it to you?" The covert sneer on the face of the other showed his own suspicions as to which way the wind might set regarding these two.

"It is no matter what it is to me—nay, I do not know in truth what it is to me," said Count Frederick, irritated almost beyond speech. "She is, as I have said, an American—she has some business here—I know little more."

"And you did not answer my main question—What is she to you?"

The nobleman turned on him angrily, in loathing of such familiarity on his part. "If I could answer that question, fellow," said he, "I would not. Since I am not able to do so, I shall not."

"Monsieur admires that jeune fille!" The sneer of the renegade once more was evident.

"Yes!" Frederick turned full upon him now. "Monsieur admires her!"

CHAPTER XXII.

The Plunge.

Roleau and Kitty learned soon enough that in a race of the best of horses against a good motor car the former has small chance. They heard the chug of the motor coming swiftly on. In turn those in the car could hear the hoof-falls of the fleeing horses. The fugitives had hurried to the rough country at the edge of the desert, but guided by a reckless driver the speeding car clung close to them.

A sudden exclamation from Roleau came back to her after a time. He pulled his horse up strongly, and she herself reined in just in time. Ahead of them lay the brink of a sheer drop of unknown depth.

"Pull off!" cried Roleau. "Get to one side and let them come—let them come on!"

She swerved quickly aside just in time, and pulled up at the brink. There she was the witness of a sudden tragedy.

The men in the car, their eyes fixed only on the two whom they pursued, did not see the brink of the bank in time. Throttle wide open, they came on at speed. Too late they realized what was ahead. The car sped out into space—how far, neither of its occupants ever had time to know.

Roleau's horse dropped into running water as boldly he sprang in out ahead of the car. Saved by his horse, he swam it to the bank. Not so fortunate those in the car. The vehicle turned over even as it fell, and dropped—a drop of many feet, pinning them under it beneath the surface of the stream. They were lost hopelessly, for had the car not crushed them they must at once have drowned, thus imprisoned.

Kitty, trembling at what she saw, remained as though paralyzed by the scene.

"Which way, excellency?" panted Roleau, riding alongside.

"Into the city," cried Kitty, "fast as we can! I will be safer at the hotel."

And so, an hour later, she gave the management of the Ritz yet more cause for wonder, when, in the early hours of the morning, bedraggled, disheveled, pale, she and her unprepossessing attendant pulled up once more in the street in front of the door.

In her own room, after a certain time devoted to her toilet, which left her more at peace with herself, Kitty sat for a time pondering. Yes, she once more had half the coin—that half given to her by the king. So far, so good. But after all, she was as far from the ultimate success of her errand as ever she had been. Her own half of the coin—that which she had brought with her from America—where was it? In the possession of a certain, tall, strong man—a man who had smiled when dangers threatened him—a man she hated with all her soul, as she now persuaded herself. She ought to hate him with all her heart—yes, she was sure of that. Where was he now? At least she had evened matters with him. Once he had left her helpless in the desert—now in turn she had left him the prisoner of ruthless men. Perhaps he never again would see the light of day—his life even now might be forfeit, for all she knew. If so, she would have been the cause of all that.

"They may kill him," said Kitty to herself. "I could not endure the thought of that—it would be my own fault. I will not admit that it was his fault I was used so cruelly by his man. He himself has laid no hand on me until this very night—and then not in rudeness. Indeed, for all I know, had he not come when he did, I myself might have paid the forfeit he may be paying now."

Kitty paused for a time to look at her own face in the glass. It was very pale, very unhappy.

"I must set him free!" said she with sudden resolve to herself. "There has been life enough lost over this already—his must not be added. I will help to get him free."

CHAPTER XXIII.

Count Sachio and His Friends.

Far across the neutral lands, beyond the desert of Intergraffen, in his hunting lodge at the edge of the forest, Count Sachio for long hours of uncertainty had nursed his own wrath and disappointment at the denouement of the scenes which he had seen take place about him. Pacing up and down, refusing food or drink, his rage always turned toward the unhappy agent Rudolph, his unsuccessful messenger.

"You, Rudolph of Grahoffen," he exclaimed at last, "you should have died rather than betray me! Ah, you betrayed our country as well."

The man addressed, now practically a prisoner, and if not an object of suspicion at least one of hostility, sat moody and unhappy in the main room of the lodge.

"I can say no more, excellency," said he. "I failed, it is true. But you do not count the skill and power of those who are arrayed against us."

"How should I count them?" exclaimed Sachio, fiercely. "Why should

Others of the Gang Cut Off Exit by the Main Gallery.

I? Can I explain to my own king—can you explain to him? Bah! man, they come to nothing in life—explanations, excuses, reasons. Results, results, results—those alone count for aught."

"Excellency, I tried."

"You tried—what is that? Rather say you failed, for that is the main thing."

"But, excellency," spoke up another man after a time, a friend of Sachio, "if it is useless to cry over spilt milk—and we cannot wholly mend this pitcher—even the trifle of milk remaining in the fragments may have some value."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, this. The young girl who was the actual instrument of Rudolph's failure—as none of us can doubt—is still alive and still at liberty."

"Well, what of that?"

"If we found her—and perhaps she can be found—we could even pick up our skein at the same knot where we left it. She is somewhere on top of earth—she is not a spirit after all, elusive though she seems."

"He Has It! Search Him!" Exclaimed Kitty.

Sachio grumbled some response, and the other went on.

"These strained times cannot hold together forever—the break will come before long. Our own monarch will not continue to endure this condition, half peace and half suspicion, that exists between the two kingdoms."

"Yes—war!" exclaimed Sachio. "But why war without success? War for plan or purpose or result—yes, we could agree to that. But curse it! man, do you not see that it all hangs on the ownership of this spirit coin? There is the issue. Without that we could gain nothing if we did go to war, not even though we won the war."

"The economy of a king may mean much, my friend," went on Sachio. "Michael, the dead king, was a business man—he saved. The economy of a people is the hope of business—the economy of a king is the hope of a people itself. There are two sorts of folk in the world—those who make mortgages and those who pay them. King Michael the Second of Gretzhoffen is one who makes mortgages. King Michael the First was one who planned to pay them. He saved the money for that purpose—he intended to leave his kingdom rich.

"But where is his hidden treasury? We know something of it—it is under the fortifications of Gretzhoffen. Our own monarch knows so much as that—but no more. He asks me to learn more definitely the location of that treasury—and what have I done? What can I do—unless at length I shall gain not one but both halves of this Gretzhoffen coin? So, is it not plain enough?"

"Thirty years ago, your excellency," rejoined his friend, "these kingdoms did fight."

"Yes, and that was ended by the alliance Michael the First formed with our own prince. Love did that, messieurs—he loved our princess, so all was forgotten. He was a good king and a strong one. There is need for another strong man like him these days—but not like the second Michael of Gretzhoffen. Why, he gave away his very birthright—won by the fair face of a girl—this strange young American, whoever she may be. He gave her the Gretzhoffen coin out of hand, as though it were no more than a farthing, for all he cared—"

"But she cared, that is evidence enough!"

"Yes, she cared, that is true; and so did another care."

"Count Frederick?"

"Yes, now you have named them both," rejoined Count Sachio, his grim jaws set. "The young woman has half the coin, Count Frederick has the other half. They must both be found, and swiftly as may be. Who will ride with me? Not you, Rudolph—someone must do the errand you failed in doing. You, Johann; you, Marco—come. We must bring back not either half of the Gretzhoffen coin tonight—but both halves."

CHAPTER XXIV.

The Quality of Mercy.

A two-fold mental attitude occupied Kitty as she still sat in her own apartment trying to make just estimate of her own necessities and those of another.

"If I sent to the police to rescue him," she said to herself—and now she called "him" one who lately had been her enemy—"they would only laugh at me. They do as they like these days. No one knows whose friends they are—those of the thieves or of honest people. No, it would be useless to tell them.

"I have it!" she exclaimed half aloud. "I see it now. The king is still afraid of his people—he is hid in his own palace now lest he see his shadow—and all the time he is looking for a strong man—the same who he called to his side that night of the ball—Count Frederick. Very well, King Michael wants Count Frederick—and he shall have him. That is to say, he shall know where he is. If the king retains any power in this distracted country, surely he can prevail against thieves such as these. Yes, I will write to the king."

"Your majesty," she wrote, "it may interest you to know that Count Frederick is being held a prisoner by a band of apaches, in their dive near his own palace. What better time than the present, therefore, to make one more visit in that dangerous locality?

"Roleau," said she a few moments later, after she had arrived upon this resolution, "Get our car once more."

"Which way now, excellency? Must you still go on in these dangerous adventures? Why not give it up? You may lose your life."

"I cannot give it up, Roleau," replied Kitty. "This time it should not be difficult—we must make one more effort for Count Frederick's portion of the coin."

"That means we must go to the palace?"

Kitty nodded. Soon the car was speeding once more down the avenues.

"Why do they still admit you here?" asked Kitty of Roleau as once more they drew up in front of the count's palace. "I should think they would forbid us both."

"I am a person of no consequence, excellency. Once of the household staff of a nobleman of this land, one is supposed to remain. You think him harsh to me—so it may seem. But these others, they figure that I still belong here. He would not speak to others of the matter at all. So I am still admitted on the old footing."

"But as to myself?"

"Excellency, I may not tell you that."

"Why not?"

"Because the truth may not wholly please you. You see they admit you because they think you still to be a friend of Count Frederick—one of his friends—I cannot explain."

Kitty somewhat flushed, did not press the argument. Enough for her that once more they were admitted freely to the palace—and once more passed back through the wide halls until at length they stood at the door of the sanctum sanctorum of the place's master—the little bedroom where Kitty was convinced he kept his secret of the coin.

She placed Roleau on guard in the hall while she herself went about an errand suddenly grown hateful to herself.

But though she sought here and there hurriedly in the drawers of the dresser here and there in such places as came to her mind, she found nothing—there was no trace of the missing object.

"Roleau," she exclaimed excitedly, going to the hall, "it will take time. Keep watch. I have no idea where he can have left it."

Puzzled, she turned from one corner of the room to the other examining the furniture, which showed a strange mixture of luxury and asceticism. Close by the head of the little iron bedstead which seemed sufficient to content the master of the place, she saw a delicate cabinet of boule.

The front of this desk was a drop leaf, which pulled out after it was set in place by a metal hinge. Back of this, in the interior of the cabinet, below a series of little pigeonholes, stood a row of three drawers of rosewood, all beautifully fitted.

The eye of Kitty caught these as she sat deliberately engaged in her distasteful but absorbing task. She drew out all three of these drawers and put them on the desk lid before her, examining each in turn. She wondered why she was glad to find there were no letters from any other woman—yes, here was one—but the writing was that of an old woman, she was sure. And here were certain rings, seals, trinkets, a miniature on ivory—even a tight curled ring of gray hair, silken and delicate.

She sat despondent after all her search. The half coin was not here. She had failed once more. Dubiously at her wit's end—for now she knew not where to look further in the room—she sat gazing at the three little rosewood drawers before her.

Suddenly an idea came to her mind. She picked up one of the drawers, and stepping to the side of the cabinet measured the depth of the drawer against that of the upper case which had contained it. It was shallower than the full depth of the desk by some three inches.

Hurriedly she stooped down in front of the desk, dropping her eyes to the level of the drawers, which in the cunning of the maker had been placed precisely where the level of the human eye would not be apt to fall. She peered back into the recess from which she had drawn the three tight fitting drawers. Beyond them she saw three little ivory knobs.

An exclamation escaped her. Not for nothing then, had been her own experience in antiques. She knew something of the cunning the old makers put into secret drawers and spaces in some of their furniture.

She thrust in her hand, grasped one of the tiny ivory knobs, and drew it gently toward her. It was as she had thought—there was a row of three shallow secret drawers in the back of the desk, hidden by the three larger ones which originally she had drawn out. Not one time in fifty would any one suspect the presence of these secret compartments. The work of the old cabinetmaker was beautifully done throughout. It had been a master mind, and a cunning one, which had designed it and executed it.

A strange sensation came to Kitty that now she was at the end of her quest. Hurriedly her fingers turned over the contents of the little receptacles. One held yet another miniature—a beautiful thing—of a lady whose high and aristocratic features reminded her of some face she could not at first tell whose. There was nothing else.

The second was also empty—just an address or so in faded yellow papers treasured for some purpose, she knew not what and could not ask.

The last drawer was filled to the top with tissue paper which had been crushed down. Her hands half-trembling, Kitty began to unfold this tissue. All at once she paused, her eyes gleaming.

The half of the Gretzhoffen coin lay in her hands!

She caught at the little silken cord about her neck, pulled to view the little chamois bag thus suspended at her corsage. From this, her hands still trembling in her haste, she brought out the king's half of the coin—that which had given her so much trouble to regain.

"They match—'tis done," exclaimed Kitty, half aloud. And indeed the broken edges of the coin fitted absolutely. Her errand was done—at last she had succeeded.

"Roleau!" she started up now. But even as she did so she stopped once more, arrested, the two halves of the coin still in her hand.

There was a little window at one side of the room, a curtained window—she had not stopped to see whether or not it was glazed. Now through the parted curtain of this little aperture she saw the leveled black barrel of a revolver protruding, its aim directly at her as she stood.

"Roleau!" she called once more, and as she spoke cowered away as best she might from the weapon whose aim was full upon her.

A number of medicines failed to bring help and Doan's Kidney Pills were finally procured at the Hirsch Drug Co. The first box brought relief and three boxes made a cure."

Deafness Cannot Be Cured

by local applications, as they cannot reach the diseased portion of the ear. There is only one way to cure deafness, and that is by constitutional remedies. Deafness is caused by an inflamed condition of the mucous lining of the Eustachian Tube. When this tube is inflamed you have a rumbling sound or imperfect hearing, and when it is entirely closed, Deafness is the result, and unless the inflammation can be taken out and this tube restored to its normal condition, hearing will be destroyed forever; nine cases out of ten are caused by Catarrh, which is nothing but an inflamed condition of the mucous surfaces.

Made Good as Deputy; Wants to Be Register

Backed by the endorsement of practically all of the members of the Bar, regardless of politics, Edward A. Cremer is asking the Republican voters of Westmoreland County to nominate him for Register of Wills.

The office is of great importance. In addition to being Probate Judge in all matters pertaining to wills and the granting of Letters of Administration, the Register is ex-officio Clerk of The Orphans' Court, and, as such, his duties relate not only to the settlement of decedents' estates but to the title to real estate as well. The volume of business transacted in this Court has grown amazingly in recent years, millions of dollars being represented annually in the accounts filed by executors and administrators, and it is imperative that the person filling the office be experienced in the duties devolving upon him.

Mr. Cremer has served an apprenticeship as Deputy Register, his appointment having been approved by Hon John B. Steel and by Hon. Charles D. Copeland, President Judges of The Orphans' Court. That he has "made good" as Deputy is attested by the support given him by members of the Bar.

AN EFFICIENT AND ECONOMICAL ADMINISTRATION IS ASSURED BY HIS NOMINATION AND ELECTION.
